Editorial Review

Review

This book is an incredibly valuable resource for the international arbitration practitioner--or any lawyer who is confronted with arbitration proceedings. It is well written, well researched and should be kept at hand for quick reference--worldwide. --Carolyn Lamm, Partner, White & Case, Washington D.C.; former President American Bar Association (ABA)

The book edited by Lawrence Newman and Colin Ong, and co-authored by some of the foremost arbitration specialists, is an incredible treasure trove both for transactional lawyers and arbitration practitioners who need to know whether and, if so, what kind of interim relief is available in the arbitration context--and who is authorized to grant it. It is a book on interim measures that is here to stay. --Franco Ferrari, Professor and Director Center for Transnational Litigation, Arbitration and Commercial Law, New York University Law School

Interim measures are an important facet of international arbitration playing a key role in making arbitration efficacious. But they are not easy to write about. What are the measures that an arbitrator can order, and can they be enforced? What do the arbitration rules say, and what are the practices? And if you prefer to go to a court because it will have powers of imperium that an arbitral tribunal lacks where will you go? The seat of arbitration? But will its measures be enforceable abroad? And will a court where assets are to be found be willing to intervene just because an international arbitral tribunal in a foreign jurisdiction is just beginning to study the merits of the disputes? The answer to most of these questions would seem to be: it depends. Larry Newman, the doyen of international arbitration and legal practice in New York, with years of expert practice in the field, and Colin Ong, a barrister of Essex Court Chambers in London with an international practice in Brunei have thought that the best way to attack the problem would be to break down the subject into 28 practical questions about the grant of interim measures by national courts and arbitral tribunals and then to direct them to 64 leading international arbitration practitioners in 43 different jurisdictions, from Argentina to Vietnam, throughout the world. The result is this book. It is a well written book by experts and will fill a need for international practitioners who need to get beyond, and rapidly, the observation 'it depends'. --W. Laurence Craig, Senior Counsel, Orrick Rambaud Martel, Paris
